

| compiled by ewa josefsson

These photobooth photos were taken over a 24-hour-period in DUMBO and Williamsburg. If it can be said that New York has a single, defining characteristic, it must surely be the citywide virtue of diversity. And not the kind found in Pollyannish municipal ad campaigns or feel-good human-interest stories on the evening news, but the kind you find every day walking down the street, in the very faces of New Yorkers, each one telling a different story.